

WJEC GCSE Art and Design Spring Term 2017 CPD Exemplar

High Achieving Exemplar - Fine Art

Portfolio = 120 Marks

Feature Studies

Before creating my self portrait, I made these feature studies. For the ear I used pencil, graphite for the nose, red ink and a dip pen for the lips, and blue biro for the eye. It was important I created these feature studies before the self portrait as after focusing on each individual part of the face, I felt more comfortable with drawing the whole face. These were drawn using mirror and from direct observation.

Self Portrait

For the self portrait I focused a lot more on getting the proportions correct so the art work resembled myself. To help with the accuracy of the drawing I measured out the distance between both sides of the face and from the forehead to the chin. This is different from my feature studies as for those I could be more creative with my choice of techniques.

Feature Studies

Before creating my self portrait, I made these feature studies. For the ear I used pencil, graphite for the nose, red ink and a dip pen for the lips, and blue biro for the eye. It was important I created these feature studies before the self portrait as after focusing on each individual part of the face, I felt more comfortable with drawing the whole face. These were drawn using a mirror and from direct observation.

Self Portrait

For the self portrait I focused alot more on getting the proportions correct so the art work resembled myself. To help with the accuracy of the drawing I measured out the distance between both sides of the face and from the forehead to the chin. This is different from my feature studies as for those I could be more creative with my choice of techniques.

Sonia Boyce

(1962-)

From Tarzan to Rambo: English Born 'Native' considers her Relationship to the Constructed Self Image and her Roots in Reconstruction 1987

Sonia Boyce's head positioning in the art work mirrors what is shown on the opposite side. This change in position impacts her relationship with the viewer by making her appear to be multi-faceted as despite only changing her head positioning / expression very slightly, the result is very different. This shows a range of experiences

a golliwog

'The Buzzing Bird sends us a victim vase.'

photo booth images inspired by Sonia Boyce

The piece of artwork shows 12 self-portraits using photography, paint, comics, collaged fragments and a variety of patterns and textures. It's a figurative piece, which is based on portrait. All the portraits are of the same scale, but some of the collaged fragments (the vase and leaves) are not necessarily in the same proportion as the faces. The artwork is fairly monochrome and subdued, but the hints of colour on some of the faces adds warmth and contrast to the black and white. Among the self-portraits there is a figure of Tarzan, drawn then painted over in pink and white. Sonia Boyce was inspired by the work of Susan Hiller, who worked on top of photographs she did in photo booths. Boyce loved the quality of the artwork Hiller created and how it felt like you were immersed in water, because of the marks she made on top.

The pattern in this piece helps break up the mirrored self-portraits and also help give the viewer further knowledge of her background and what images she associated her identity with. The repetition of the work is very effective as from the left to the right of the artwork, the pictures become clearer and more colourful. The repetition has a film like quality.

Sonia Boyce was trying to comment on how predominantly white controlled media has created stereotypes of black people, presenting them as 'reckless' and 'uncivilised'. This is reinforced in the text, 'the buzzing bird sends us a victim', which implies that black characters are often portrayed as inarticulate. She took inspiration from her childhood, the Tarzan films and golliwog (a parody of the black body, and how they reinforce negative stereotypes

Stencil Printing

This paper stencil is a development of one of my drawings. Using a scalpel I cut out the parts of the face that I wanted to contain paint. I then stippled the paint onto the template using a brush. I used a flipping technique to prevent the template from moving as much and to also get an even amount of paint onto each cut out. I printed my A3 stencil onto a sheet of music, and also onto 2-pieces of paper, both with a wash of ink (one in blue and one in burnt sienna). I really like the contrast between the delicate eye and eyebrow area and the black shape of the hair sphere. I also like the stark contrast between the burnt sienna background and the black of the print.

Colour Mixing

Colour is described by the following 3 characteristics

HUE = the name of a particular colour

VALUE = the relative lightness or darkness of a particular colour

INTENSITY = the purity of a colour which determines its relative brightness or dullness primary colours - red, blue + yellow secondary colours - green, orange + purple tertiary colours - brown

SKIN

BASE

- white
- pyrite red
- yellow ochre

BASE 2

- BASE + more pyrite red

more

- BASE + less white

more

- BASE 2 + less white

more

- under eye
- white
- yellow ochre
- black
- cyan blue

EYES

more

- black
- cyan blue

more

- white
- black
- azo lemon yellow
- cyan blue

more

- DARK TONE + more white

more

- LIGHT TONE + more white

WARM COLOURS/ADVANCING COLOURS - reds, oranges, yellows

COOL COLOURS/RECEDING COLOURS - greens, blues, violets

Tai-Schan Schierenberg (1962-)

A girl, 2012

This oil painting uses block colours and an expressive application of the paint to make the portrait appear 3D and realistic while still maintaining an abstract quality to the skin. This is reinforced by the startling and unexpected blocks of warm yellow close to the eye and of warm pink on the cheeks. The heavy red/pink on the skin contrasts to the application to the skin contrasts to the hair which is more flowing. The intense white on the nose, under eye, forehead and in the hair makes the viewer's attention be drawn to the centre of the painting. The coat she is wearing adds to this as it encircles the face and neck and the dark blue contrasts to the orange on the face. Her gaze is looking towards the ground which seems thoughtful and calm. The expression differs from the aggressive brush strokes which makes the portrait more visually interesting.

Schierenberg's self portrait is interesting as it combines the different perspectives into one portrait. Janus was a Roman god who is often depicted with two faces since he looks to the past and the future. This is an oil painting and he has applied the paint in an assertive and bold fashion. You can see the brush strokes and the paint applied is reasonably purely which helps add dimension to the face. The background and top he is wearing are minimal meaning that the two faces are the focal points of the artwork. I like how the faces aren't looking at the viewer as it adds to the feeling of angst portrayed in the rushed brush strokes and differing emotions in the two faces. The composition reinforces the movement of the brush strokes.

Self-Portrait as Janus, 2008

To the right is a section of a mixing palette I used to create the painting below. Schierenberg's paintings contain multiple different colours and tones to create a realistic impression of skin so I also ensured I had a variety of different shades in order that I could replicate this effect. To help make the skin tone look somewhat believable I built on colours I had already mixed and I worked from warm tones to cool tones. As I knew I needed a lot of paint to create texture, I mixed a lot of different skin tones using mostly red, a warm yellow and white. After the base of the face was painted on, I introduced more blue and purple tones so my mixing palette.

Below is a cut out of a painting I made inspired by Schierenberg's portraits opposite. Like him I layered paint thickly onto the face to create texture and I made the brush strokes bold and visible to add dimension. I didn't blend all the shades together in order that the colours of the face remained pure. Like 'A girl', I made the hair more fluid while still incorporating different hues and colours. What differs from my painting and Schierenberg is that he used oil paint while I use acrylic and also how the eye gaze in my mine is looking straight at the viewer while Schierenberg's portraits look to the side. This makes mine seem more assertive and striking while his 'self-portrait as Janus' appears thoughtful and self-conscious.

Another thing that makes my self portrait differ to Schierenberg's is that it is a close up of the face which I believe mirrors the confident brush strokes. Also, Schierenberg's paintings are on a much larger scale while mine is small which contrasts to the loud painting style.

Cyanotypes - a photographic blueprint

To create this cyanotype I placed plants on light sensitive paper and exposed it to sunlight for 15 minutes. After 15 minutes I took the objects off the paper and soaked it in water. I love the dainty of this cyanotype and it seems very pure and this reminds me of a sunset by the sea. I hope being very busy that I didn't miss any of the different strengths of white and blue in the waves.

For this cyanotype I placed a drawing of my fish on top of the light sensitive paper as well as some leaves. I like the effect I had on the end piece so I made the cyanotype more relaxed so they aren't as sharp and I think the softness of the fish contrasts well with the delicacy of the leaves. There is less variation in colour with the fish than with the above leaves and although I do like this print, the lack of contrast makes it appear a bit more one dimensional.

I made this cyanotype using the same technique as my one with the fish on the opposite page. With this one I stuck the acetate I used to create the print onto the finished work but at a slight angle so that the original marks still can be seen. I really love the white work that's left by the small leaves I placed and how they are rather fuzzy around the edges and not too precise as I believe this juxtaposes well with the stark black line of the fish on acetate.

After making this cyanotype I decided to use ink to paint a silhouette of myself which is like one of the photos I took of my shadows. I like the simplicity of this cyanotype and now by using dark blue ink instead of black it doesn't overpower or draw too much attention away from the leaves. Within the leaves you can see white marks left by my drawing of my fish which had been overexposed. However I like this aspect of the print as it adds a bit of light and brightness without overpowering the leaves and makes the artwork more interesting and intriguing.

For this piece I drew inspiration from the artists in the previous page. Like Helio I used a colorful variety of bright thread which was a nice contrast to the clear black and white perspex. I tried to emulate Arsen's style of creating geometric patterns with the thread which I believe was successful!

For the cyanotype on the bottom of the page opposite, I mimicked Helio's use of intricate whorls as seen in "Mauritius unicombe".

Pinhole Photographs

Kathryn Faulkner Jim's Bed, 2001

I really like this photograph because of the way the light reflects from the window and the simple composition. The viewpoint is looking slightly up to the room and I like how instead of focusing in on one object, the pinhole camera captured the whole room.

A pinhole camera is a very simple camera which has a light-proof box, film and a pinhole which allows light to enter through the box and onto the film. They have to be left for about 15 minutes (depending on how sunny a day it is) before the film can be processed. This means that they have to be placed on the floor table etc. meaning that they have a completely different viewpoint than what a normal hand-held camera gives. Also, the pinhole camera doesn't allow you to zoom into an object so you have to position it to your chosen object closer or further away to the camera. The end photograph is often very clear as the pinhole makes sure that every point emitting light is viewed & captured in the film.

What I hope to include in my pinhole photographs which is captured in Faulkner's photograph is the effect of light and shade. I will hopefully achieve this by placing and positioning my objects in an area of sunlight or next to a window. I also want to experiment with the angle I place my camera and how far away it is to my composition.

In taking my photos I had a clear shadow of the objects from the light with the glass table in the foreground which I particularly like as it looks like the light is looking at its own reflection. This photograph is particularly captured lots of the surrounding the detail on the camera with the blurry and best performance which I took away from this photograph was that glass or reflective objects worked well in the presence of light.

Despite initially being disappointed with the outside of this photograph as it is underexposed, I have really become to love it because of its simplicity and brightness. The way that light is clearly the focal point of the work and I like how in the composition it is slightly of course. I also love that the light has picked up on the light and dark parts of them and this makes the image more lively and captures the dark and striking rabbit.

What I find interesting about this photograph is that although some areas (like the rabbit) are very dark, other areas (like the table) my objects were placed very clearly and underexposed. With this photo I decided to have the pinhole camera closer to my objects so they were emphasized and that is also helped by the fairly close background. If I could change the thing about this photo I would not be the very dark table in the foreground as I believe that it is too distracting. Despite this when I inverted the image to use for my collage (read page 2) I found that the brightness was not too distracting.

The toy rabbit in this drawing is one that I made when I was younger. To emphasize the emotional attachment I have to it, I decided to create a more sensitive and detailed drawing. I really like the effect having the toy in a box has on it as despite being stuck inside the container, parts of the toy hands stick out and hang out of the top and gaps, making the drawing seem more multi-dimensional. In response to the theme of capturing what is often the most multi-faceted and meaningful to me, I took some digital photos as seen opposite with both of these photos. I don't arrange the items in their opposite ways with these photos already in their own collection. It's a bit more personal and organic than the former ones. I believe it's also a bit more of a more and I think that if I tried to package the photos it would have lost some of their sense of identity. I like it then.

Jars and Boxes

Man Ray (1890-1976)

Rayograph, Curio, Spoon, Box, Bottle, Needle and other forms 1922

Man Ray was an American artist who lived in Paris for a period of time. He is well known for his rayographs and he was influenced by artists like Picasso and Strindberg.

After being inspired by how Cornell, Conde and Brown displayed their work I decided to pursue beyond the themes of jars and boxes. I found glass jars particularly interesting as although being clear and the contents inside being visible, the objects inside can become distorted and warped as seen with my drawing opposite. I also thought that a selection of jars would work well as a series of photographs. Like Man Ray I used ordinary everyday objects and by placing them in jars, some of them were unrecognisable. Unlike Man Ray, I positioned each jar in the photograph within a grid like pattern which is slightly similar to Van Man's film of Osteoecene.

I think boxes and jars can be related to the theme of 'the City of Us' as they can imply that things feel cages or boxes in and that people (the city of us) is restricted. I also feel like and outside of a box can always be how you present yourself to the world and all the hidden things inside of things can symbolise the person or thing that contains it. Some things within things of things in the world (things that are hidden) can be seen. I think that you can see things that are hidden and that you can see things that are hidden and that you can see things that are hidden and that you can see things that are hidden.

be restricted to a box or a grid. Boxes symbolise how we contain ourselves or objects that make you think of someone's content (like the previous drawings I wrote) and I think that that could create a close relationship with the idea of art-work.

Above is a photograph of jars that I worked like into. I like how vibrant the red and green is in comparison to the black and white photograph, but also to each other as they are complementary colours. However, I think this piece would have been even stronger if the photograph I used had a warmer palette.

The photo ~~shown~~ below I think was successful in that it was strong area of light and darkness and I like how the jars are positioned in the centre of the composition.

With the photographs opposite I experimented with different ways of displaying the jars. I realised the lighting was important but I decided that the objects might be familiar. I decided to use a range of objects in these photographs, some being very recognisable (like a sock) and some unclear (things)

Howard Hodgkin (1932-)

Howard Hodgkin is a painter, printmaker and collector. He was born in England and is best known for his small scale abstract paintings like the ones below and he paints very slowly, occasionally over 4 years for one painting.

Rain, 1991

What I find most fascinating about Hodgkin's works is how he incorporates framing devices into the actual artwork and the effect that is seen with 'Rain', here we are in 'Croydon' and 'Sight and Sound' and many more of his most famous paintings. Hodgkin extends the paint over and over the frames which are usually second hand or antique and wooden. Despite painting over the frames, the change in texture and height relates a distorted image and the inside space remains the focal point of the work. Also, in all of the artworks,

Night and Day, 1999

Not We are in Croydon, 1997

Hodgkin's thick and bold lines contrasting saturated colors and range of geometric and organic shapes creates depth. By extending the paint system to all corners and spaces in the canvas the artwork appears more confined.

above, Hodgkin's brush mimics the frame and it is almost as if he is sketching on a new and different frame to the piece which differs from the previous flat toned and usually rectangular one. By extending the painting onto the frame I believe Hodgkin was trying to prevent the idea of being constricted and contained.

This strongly relates to my extended theme of boxes and jars as the box acts like a framing device to the object inside. Unlike Hodgkin I don't let it truly extend and incorporate the object into the box, but I do believe that by using transparent jars, the object automatically is present when one sees the jar and is slight, similar to Hodgkin's paintings.

In regards to framing devices, there are many other examples which can change the impression an art work gives off. A grid could be used and if the subject of the painting is restricted by the squares it could demonstrate something and order, while if the subject extended past the squares it would strongly contrast and seem unexpected. A camera lens also frames an object in a photo so by varying the shape, angle and zoom, the view shifts with a portrait photo like the one I have in the left, everything in sight is usually captured. A photo with the shape of a square can seem the most direct and perfect, and a wide photo often more so as it conveys more of the scene than what is seen. It then creates a narrative

Oil Painting using a palette knife

Genevieve Galloway

Unlike acrylic and watercolour, oil paint takes a long time to dry. This can be an advantage as paint colours don't dry up so quickly, however, this can make it hard to layer colour without them blending together and becoming muddied. Oil paint also has a really nice shine when finished which is harder to achieve with acrylic and the colours are very vibrant. The above painting by Genevieve Galloway used a palette knife to create a rough but fresh impression. I also love how colourful the painting is and there is a white space exposed meaning the painting completely covers the canvas. Using a palette knife is harder than a brush if you are trying to do a detailed and clear picture. However it gives more texture to a painting than a brush with a paint brush. I also love how Galloway kept the colours pure and I like how despite the composition seeming quite busy, the flowers are still the focus of the piece. The knife strokes are also going in different directions which adds a jagged effect.

This work has taught me to apply oil paint with a palette knife thickly and not mix the colours. A challenge with using a palette knife is that I find when creating my painting that sometimes the knife would scrape up all the paint I had mixed and as it took so long to dry. To overcome this I plan layered my paint on above thickly to give them a bit of time to dry. As the black and white strokes on the picture had many colours on them so I make sure to incorporate all of yellow and blue to make the painting more 3D. One disadvantage with the palette was that I had to simplify details. I blended my colours on my painting (unlike Galloway) by layering different shades of colour on and although I achieved by blending them. I think the sense of movement I achieved by having all the knife strokes go in the same direction was fairly successful. This technique is definitely very effective when trying to build up texture and I can imagine using it a career and wider painting. However, if I want to achieve a more subtle and sensitive painting, this technique would probably not be as good as a paint brush.

Above is a purse I painted using the palette knife technique. With this work I tried to include a lot of tonal variation and a mixture of both warm and cool tones to give it more dimension. I like the effect of using cardboard as a surface to paint on and although I think the work would be less successful if I was using a brush as the rougher ridges in the cardboard, palette knife I believe works really well on this surface.

Above is a purse I painted using the palette knife technique. With this work I tried to include a lot of tonal variation and a mixture of both warm and cool tones to give it more dimensions. I like the effect of using cardboard as a surface to paint on and although I think the work would be less successful if I was using a brush as the result would be less intricate because of the ridges in the cardboard, palette knife I believe works really well on this surface.

Head, c. 1961
Frank Auerbach

Gerda Boehm, 1964

Like Auerbach and Boehm I attempted to use an impasto technique in order to support great depth and drama. Unlike Boehm and Auerbach I resorted to heavily delineated paint around the margin using a mixture of paint brush and palette knife, while both of the artists filled the page with thick and bold brushstrokes. The protruding nature of their artwork makes the visual feel intimate upon and this effect is amplified when the scale of the artwork is large.

Using a palette knife to apply all paint deftly makes the subject of the artwork more ambiguous and hard to distinguish. I really like the contrast in this painting between the more thinly applied paint to the impasto technique as keeps the viewer's attention fixed on the piece and makes it less overwhelming to look at.

Oil Painting using a Brush

As well as choosing to paint using a palette knife, I decided to paint using a fine point brush. I found this not only the process of painting my art to be different, but also the final, as the painting became something more subtle, muted and sensitive.

Oil painting using a brush is a much more delicate process than a palette knife, involving delicate and more subtle colour and a much more delicate appearance is created. When using a fine brush I can see the complexity of things which are not so apparent when using a palette knife. The brush strokes are more visible and the overall effect is more delicate and sensitive. The brush strokes are more visible and the overall effect is more delicate and sensitive. The brush strokes are more visible and the overall effect is more delicate and sensitive.

Single White Boxes 2007 E. Daniel Fogel

The House of Packages
Mary Maxam

Mary Maxam is from the United States and her work is inspired by landscapes, gardens and people throughout the southwest.

E. Daniel Fogel is also from the US and he is said to be inspired by Federico Barro. Although he tends to work from ordinary objects they often hold strong metaphors and symbolic meaning to him.

This oil painting is a still life of boxes - like Fogel painting there isn't a huge range in colour, with maximum focus on form, in warm tones here. The composition is much simpler than Fogel's and this is balanced out by making the brush strokes more visible and less precise. The brush around the box manages to connect the main subject of the art work, with the background and it grounds the object in the composition. With this painting Maxam adds more precision to the ribbon, by accentuating the light and shade in the piece.

In my painting opposite I tried to blend the brush strokes to create a more smooth surface like the box looks painting. However, I did use brush strokes to suggest some sense of form and to make the box appear more three dimensional. Like Fogel I used two different basic colours for the foreground and background. I used a slightly warmer pink for the foreground as warm colours tend to catch the viewer's attention. This would help make the box more the focal point of the artwork.

Continuing my idea of containing meaningful objects in containers, I created 2 photographs. The bottom right has an almost x-ray effect and this makes the work more revealing and gives new life to the objects. I like the contrast between the almost left clear box with the more ambiguous object inside the plastic bag. For the photo below I tried to place 12 various containers in an almost symmetrical position in which each object is given equal weight and attention. The composition also feels like some organic and deliberate while the plastic bag above feels more organic and natural.

This photograph I think was successful as it is neither too dark in colour nor too light which means I exposed it in the dark room for an appropriate amount of time. I like how the photo is slightly blurry as it suggests a sense of movement and motion like still being clear and detailed enough for the composition to make sense and be interesting. I really like use spots of white in this piece and the one opposite as it gives the photo a more vintage appearance that reminds me strongly of 60s black and white film which suggests a narrative. The shadows over the top right of the photo opposite creates more depth and mystery to the photograph as there is a range in tone and the viewer has to examine the edge of the piece more carefully to decipher what exactly is in the center. This also applies to the photo above with the stream of light passing diagonally across the centre of the photo adding more range into dimension.

So far with my photography and paintings, colour has played a significant role in the end results of the piece. However with black and white, detail and tone variation plays a more important role in creating a narrative. While black and white can tend to be quite a harsh contrast, I like how these photos are more subtle and muted.

Composition Ideas

I plan on making either a large A1 size oil painting or 3 smaller A3 size oil paintings related to and developing from the ideas and drawings I have so far explored from my analysis of the oil painting in the previous page and how they suggest a narrative. I feel as though a strong contrasting background would be necessary in order to give my chosen ideas more emphasis and as focal point. I have been greatly inspired by the work of Joseph Cornell, another cubist, through his work, and also 'La Sédution' which was a photograph I arranged earlier. The above drawing represents Cornell's shadow boxes but also my sister's (a child) containing identical to I want to paint a scene like this it would be at a scale of A1 because I want the viewer to feel drawn in both size and to view it like a TV. The little figures/animals would ideally be a warm tone to warm and the background a cool one just to bring the sketch further forward. I also really want to paint a variety of textures and mark making in my final painting to because it would give my composition more interesting visual unity including one from above.

If I were to place 7 individual paintings, they would be similar to the one above in that it would be a series of sketches in a variety of contrasts. If I was to further explore the unity and similarities between each painting I would use either similar shapes, boxes, similar sized objects or a recurring theme throughout such as: childhood, collections, boxes inside boxes. When making a series of paintings I'll explore in narrative a story based, as it can create ideas of story lines and differences, and similarities and highlights what is main. If I were to take this approach, I would keep the background very neutral, use a white or pale blue just to make the objects more clear and stand out.

This drawing represents what I'm planning to place for my final work in painting. The idea of the painting will be about a 1. with a variety of marks making the crosshatching, straight lines and general shading, I tried to illustrate how I would plan to vary my application of all points. To add texture I plan to use a mixture of palette knife for the palm and a fine brush for the hair. I might use a larger brush for the feet, side of the piece, but because I didn't see what an object would be drawn in. My idea about the size of the work.

Maria Treger

Cyanotypes

I have previously explored making cyanotypes to reflect my ideas of identity but not for the size of me. Also for the cyanotype process I used a different method of creating them. In a dark room, I printed light sensitive paper to ultra violet light using a lens. I was using a lens which was not used in the past. This technique created a more accurate work and was more reliable. The sharp linear lines created when making cyanotypes are very effective as seen with Maria Treger and the bird were completely the most dramatic and dramatic.

For the photographs to the left I experimented with changing the colour palette of the photos to try and manipulate the photo to make it look like a cyanotype. I did this by using Photoshop and by clicking on image then adjustment and then hue/saturation and I varied the amount of hue and the saturation of the colour until it reached an appropriate tone. I also changed the colour balance setting which helped remove red and warm tones from the photo. Of course it is not identical to the effect of actually using the traditional cyanotype technique, but it encapsulates the mood created by only using one colour and a small range of colours/tones.

